

Fig. 35

3522

ical demands, the resignation of Gorbachev. To be sure, as part of Ukraine, Donbas was now on Leonid Kravchuk's conscience. Vorkuta and Kuzbas were coal-mining areas I had visited a number of times and to which I would certainly return. Their demands were harshly formulated at times, and they expected a great deal from me, but they supported me during the tough reforms.

We have a saying in Russia that when you chop wood, the chips fly. Although Khasbulatov tried his best to portray the miners as economic chips flying from the Galdar team's woodcutting, their demand did not fit the picture. These miners were not against reform. Nevertheless, they did try to defend their economic interests, insisting that such hard work should be rewarded with part of the overall profits from the industry. Unfortunately, we did not have precise mechanism to turn such enterprises as coal mines into joint stock companies. There were long, hard negotiations under way constantly.

product/service identification

3524

hypertext link

3526

I met Yuri Skokov when I worked at the Moscow City Executive Committee. He was director of Quannum, a large defense plant, and he had run for elections to the Soviet parliament against Vitaly Korotich, a prominent writer and journalist who at the time was editor in chief of Ogonoyok [Little Flame], a pioneer of glasnost. Due to various backroom deals and party scheming (described in Against the Grain), Skokov won the election and proved himself to be a disciplined party protégé.

Skokov is an intelligent man — that is the first thing that must be said about him. And very hard and taciturn. Many people were asking what his role was in my inner circle. It was a legitimate question. Skokov was actually the "shadow" prime minister whom I had always had in mind. Both Silayev, under whom Skokov chaired the Supreme Economic Council, and Gaidar, on whose watch Skokov became chairman of the Security Council, sensed a latent threat menu | information | purchase | sample | catalog | browser | < | >

3528

3562

3564

3530

3532

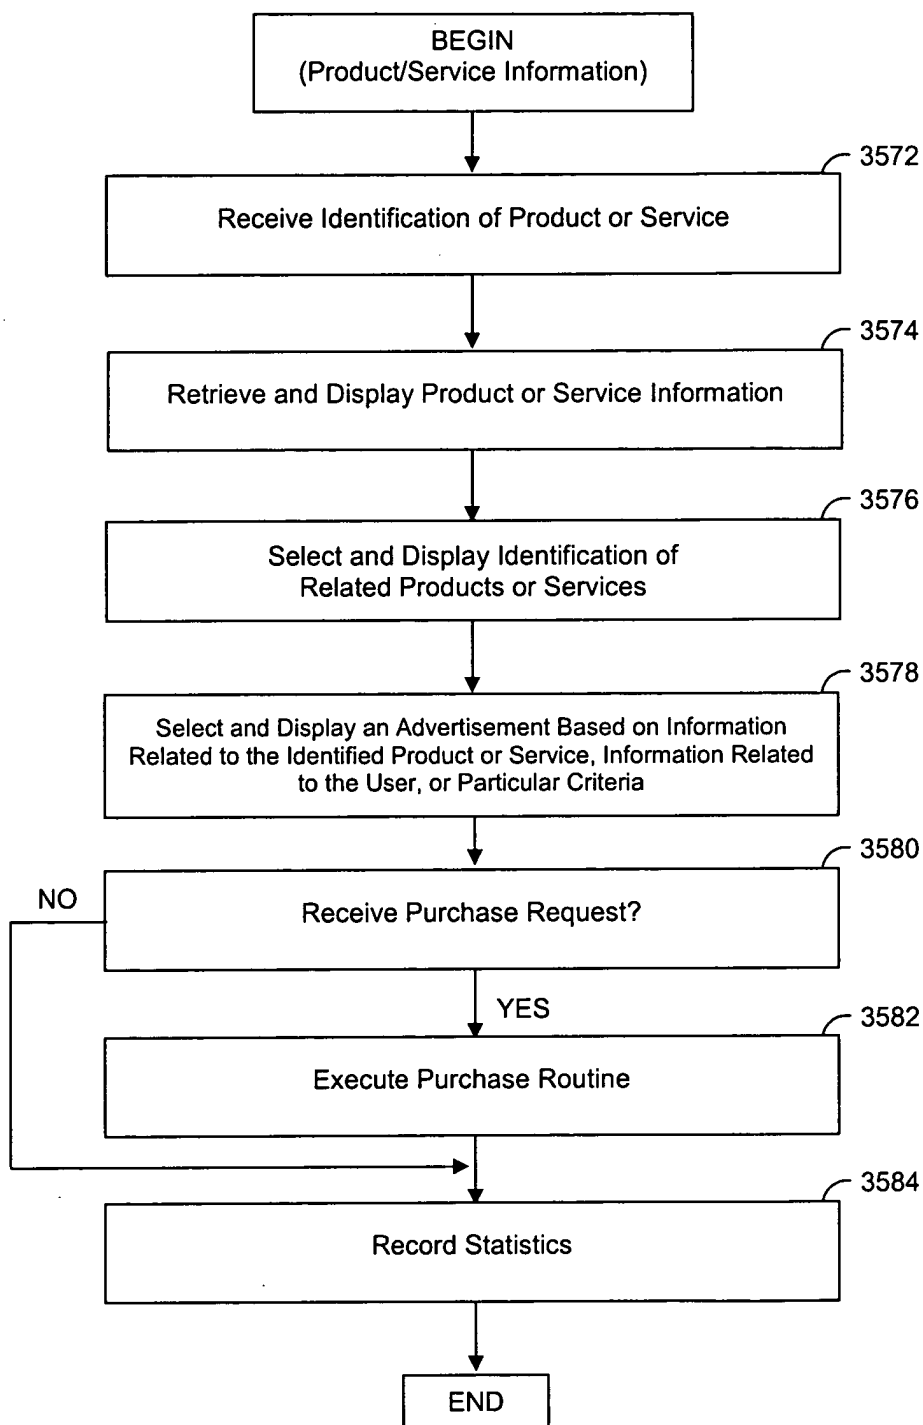

3534

3536

3538

3560

Fig. 36

Fig. 37

3590

ical demands, the resignation of Gorbachev. To be sure, as part of Ukraine, Donbas was now on Leonid Kravchuk's conscience. Vorkuta and Kuzbas were coal-mining areas I had visited a number of times and to which I would certainly return. Their demands were harshly formulated at times, and they expected a great deal from me, but they supported me during the tough reforms.

We have a saying in Russia that when you chop wood, the chips fly. Although Khasbulatov tried his best to portray the miners as economic chips flying from the Galdar team's woodcutting, their demand did not fit the picture. These miners were not against reform. Nevertheless, they did try to defend their economic interests, insisting that such hard work should be rewarded with part of the overall profits from the industry. Unfortunately, we did not have precise mechanism to turn such enterprises as coal mines into joint stock companies. There were long, hard negotiations under way constantly.

I met Yuri Skokov when I worked at the Moscow City Executive Committee. He was director of Quannum, a large defense plant, and he had run for elections to the Soviet parliament against Vitaly Korotich, a prominent writer and journalist who at the time was editor in chief of Ogonoyok [Little Flame]; a pioneer of glasnost. Due to various backroom deals and party scheming (described in Against the Grain), Skokov won the election and proved himself to be a disciplined party protégé.

Skokov is an intelligent man — that is the first thing that must be said about him. And very hard and taciturn. Many people were asking what his role was in my inner circle. It was a legitimate question. Skokov was actually the “shadow” prime minister whom I had always had in mind. Both Silayev, under whom Skokov chaired the Supreme Economic Council, and Gaidar, on whose watch Skokov became chairman of the Security Council, sensed a latent threat product/service information related product/service information

advertisement

menu | information | purchase | sample | catalog | browser | < | >

Fig. 38

Fig. 39a

Fig. 39b

3650

Fig. 40

Fig. 41

3680

Fig. 42

ical demands, the resignation of Gorbachev. To be sure, as part of Ukraine, Donbas was now on Leonid Kravchuk's conscience. Vorkuta and Kuzbas were coal-mining areas I had visited a number of times and to which I would certainly return. Their demands were harshly formulated at times, and they expected a great deal from me, but they supported me during the tough reforms.

We have a saying in Russia that when you chop wood, the chips fly. Although Khasbulatov tried his best to portray the miners as economic chips flying from the Gaidar team's woodcutting, their demand did not fit the picture. These miners were not product sample

3722

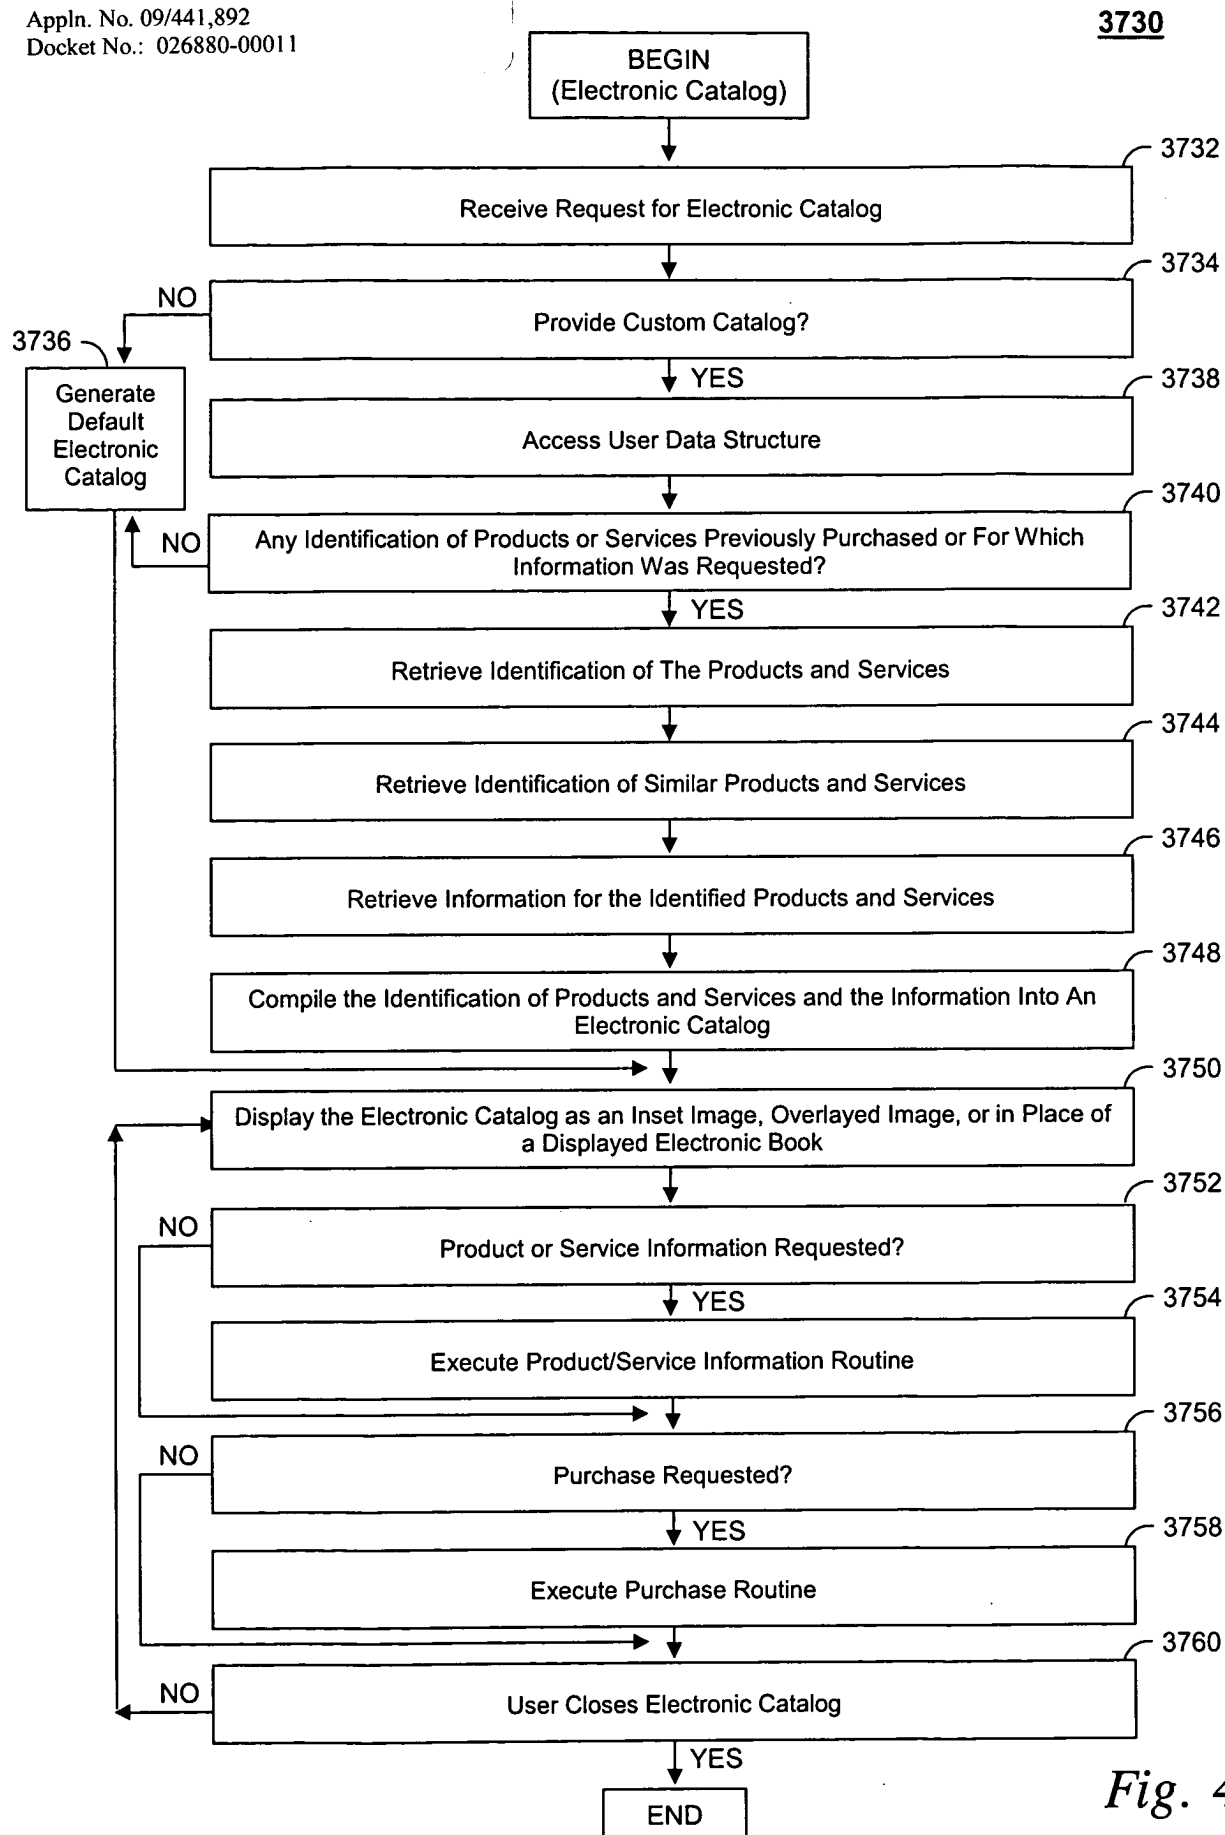

3522 — against reform. Nevertheless, they did try to defend their economic interests, insisting that such hard work should be rewarded with part of the overall profits from the industry. Unfortunately, we did not have precise mechanism to turn such enterprises as coal mines into joint stock companies. There were long, hard negotiations under way constantly.

I met Yuri Skokov when I worked at the Moscow City Executive Committee. He was director of Quannum, a large defense plant, and he had run for elections to the Soviet parliament against Vitaly Korotich, a prominent writer and journalist who at the time was editor in chief of Ogonoyok [Little Flame], a pioneer of glasnost. Due to various backroom deals and party scheming (described in Against the Grain), Skokov won the election and proved himself to be a disciplined party protégé.

Skokov is an intelligent man — that is the first thing that must be said about him. And very hard and taciturn. Many people were asking what his role was in my inner circle. It was a legitimate question. Skokov was actually the "shadow" prime minister whom I had always had in mind. Both Silayev, under whom Skokov chaired the Supreme Economic Council, and Gaidar, on whose watch Skokov became chairman of the Security Council, sensed a latent threat

3528 — menu | information | purchase | sample | catalog | browser | < | >

Fig. 43

3770

3772

3774

product/service 1

3776

product/service 2

3778

product/service N

ical demands, the resignation of Gorbachev. To be sure, as part of Ukraine, Donbas was now on Leonid Kravchuk's conscience. Vorkuta and Kuzbas were coal-mining areas I had visited a number of times and to which I would certainly return. Their demands were harshly formulated at times, and they expected a great deal from me, but they supported me during the tough reforms.

We have a saying in Russia that when you chop wood, the chips fly. Although Khasbulatov tried his best to portray the miners as economic chips flying from the Galdar team's woodcutting, their demand did not fit the picture. These miners were not against reform. Nevertheless, they did try to defend their economic interests, insisting that such hard work should be rewarded with part of the overall profits from the industry. Unfortunately, we did not have precise mechanism to turn such enterprises as coal mines into joint stock companies. There were long, hard negotiations under way constantly.

3522

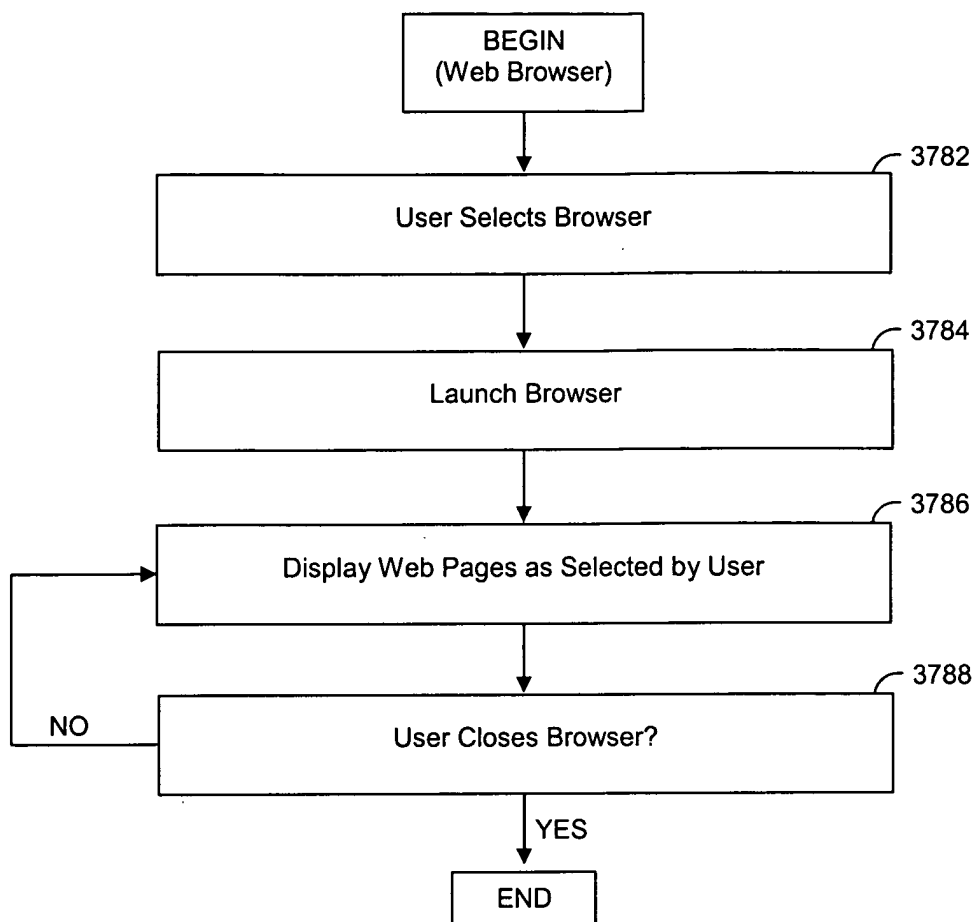

I met Yuri Skokov when I worked at the Moscow City Executive Committee. He was director of Quannum, a large defense plant, and he had run for elections to the Soviet parliament against Vitaly Korotich, a prominent writer and journalist who at the time was editor in chief of Ogonoyok [Little Flame], a pioneer of glasnost. Due to various backroom deals and party scheming (described in Against the Grain), Skokov won the election and proved himself to be a disciplined party protégé.

Skokov is an intelligent man — that is the first thing that must be said about him. And very hard and taciturn. Many people were asking what his role was in my inner circle. It was a legitimate question. Skokov was actually the "shadow" prime minister whom I had always had in mind. Both Silayev, under whom Skokov chaired the Supreme Economic Council, and Gaidar, on whose watch Skokov became chairman of the Security Council, sensed a latent threat

3528

menu | information | purchase | sample | catalog | browser | < | >

Fig. 45

Fig. 46

ical demands, the resignation of Gorbachev. To be sure, as part of Ukraine, Donbas was now on Leonid Kravchuk's conscience. Vorkuta and Kuzbas were coal-mining areas I had visited a number of times and to which I would certainly return. Their demands were harshly formulated at times, and they expected a great deal from me, but they supported me during the tough reforms.

3522 We have a saying in Russia that when you chop wood, the chips fly. Although Khasbulatov tried his best to portray the miners as economic chips flying from the Galdar team's woodcutting, their demand did not fit the picture.

These miners were not against reform. Nevertheless, they did try to defend their economic interests, insisting that such hard work should be rewarded with part of the overall profits from the industry. Unfortunately, we did not have precise mechanism to turn such enterprises as coal mines into joint stock companies. There were long, hard negotiations under way constantly.

I met Yuri Skokov when I worked at the Moscow City Executive Committee. He was director of Quannum, a large defense plant, and he had run for elections to the Soviet parliament against Vitaly Korotich, a prominent writer and journalist who at the time was editor in chief of Ogonoyok [Little Flame], a pioneer of glasnost. Due to various backroom deals and party scheming (described in Against the Grain), Skokov won the election and proved himself to be a disciplined party protégé.

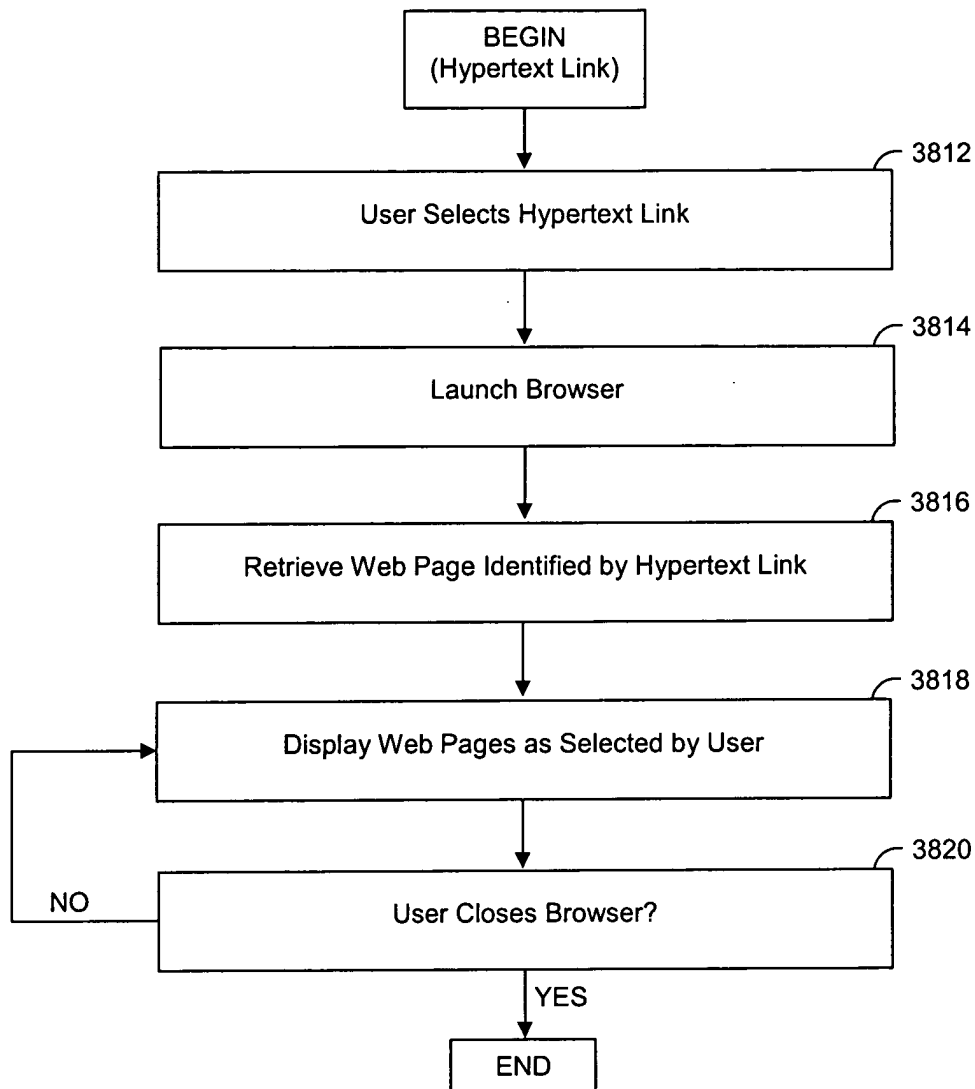

Skokov is an intelligent man — that is the first thing that must be said about him. And very hard and taciturn. Many people were asking what his role was in my inner circle. It was a legitimate question. Skokov was actually the "shadow" prime minister whom I had always had in mind. Both Silayev, under whom Skokov chaired the Supreme Economic Council, and Gaidar, on whose watch Skokov became chairman of the Security Council, sensed a latent threat web browser

3802

3528 menu | information | purchase | sample | catalog | browser | < | >

Fig. 47

Fig. 48